Specialities:

Gear:

Summary: (machine translated)
Technical and slippery canyon that due to its size must be tackled with time, energy and good rope handling. It is not particularly aesthetic but very intense and immersive.
This review has been created after having done the descent without an exhaustive record. The number of rappels, order and lengths are approximate.

Hydrology: (machine translated)
The gully is open so you can escape at almost any point (usually to the right).

Access: (machine translated)
From Navalacruz, continue along AV-P-415 for 4km until a hill. From there there is a track on the right next to some livestock buildings. Always take the path on the right until you reach the field where we leave the car (option 2 cars) or the descent material to avoid carrying it uphill (option 1 car).

Approach: (machine translated)
With 2 cars, we will park in the field and descend to the riverbed and, without losing height, we continue through some meadows located to the right of the riverbed to the first rappel.
With 1 car, there are two options: option 1 (1h), to go up parallel to the stream of the cimorro (about 50m to the left of the riverbed there is a milestone) on a steep path that appears and disappears until you reach the upper area where the vegetation is more closed and you have to find your own way. Option 2 (1h 40min), go up the path at the bottom of the valley along a path that runs parallel to the road to the fork to the right and there take the access path.

Tour: (machine translated)
We begin in a flatter first part with spaced out ledges and from R3 onwards, rappel after rappel is chained with little distance between them. The rock in this canyon is very slippery and the ledges are generally steep.

Return: (machine translated)
The last rappel ends at the dam of an old mill where the car can be left.
