Summary: (machine translated)
Also known as Saltant del Grau because of the farmhouse (rural house) located at the top of the ravine.
Simple canyon, open and with water only in the rainy season, has a beautiful waterfall and an ideal environment for canyoning. In addition we can combine it with Regatell immediately.

Hydrology: (machine translated)
In most of the descent, it is very open and there are several trails that cross it.

Access: (machine translated)
We are located in Berga on the C16 or in Solsona. In both cases you have to take the C26 that joins them.
At the height of Avià, in the p.k. 142,4, there is a turn in the road with a bridge over the Bellús, with a detour to "Cal Grane". We will go along this road until the asphalted road ends. Next to it we will have a damming of the river and a widening where to park.
If we have a tall car we can continue a little further along the track and make a couple of curves but it is not worth much.
Another option would be to take the BV4241 towards Capolat and then turn off towards El Grau and park at the top of the ravine. To combine cars is not too interesting since the approach is not so long and also worth the trail.

Approach: (machine translated)
We will continue along the track parallel to the Bellús, further on it becomes a path that continues in the same northwest direction towards the Grau. It will approach the stream and crosses the waterfall area to move to the orographic right where we find another track that takes us up to the Grau. Shortly before arriving, when crossing a tributary we will see the facility to rappel to the stream.

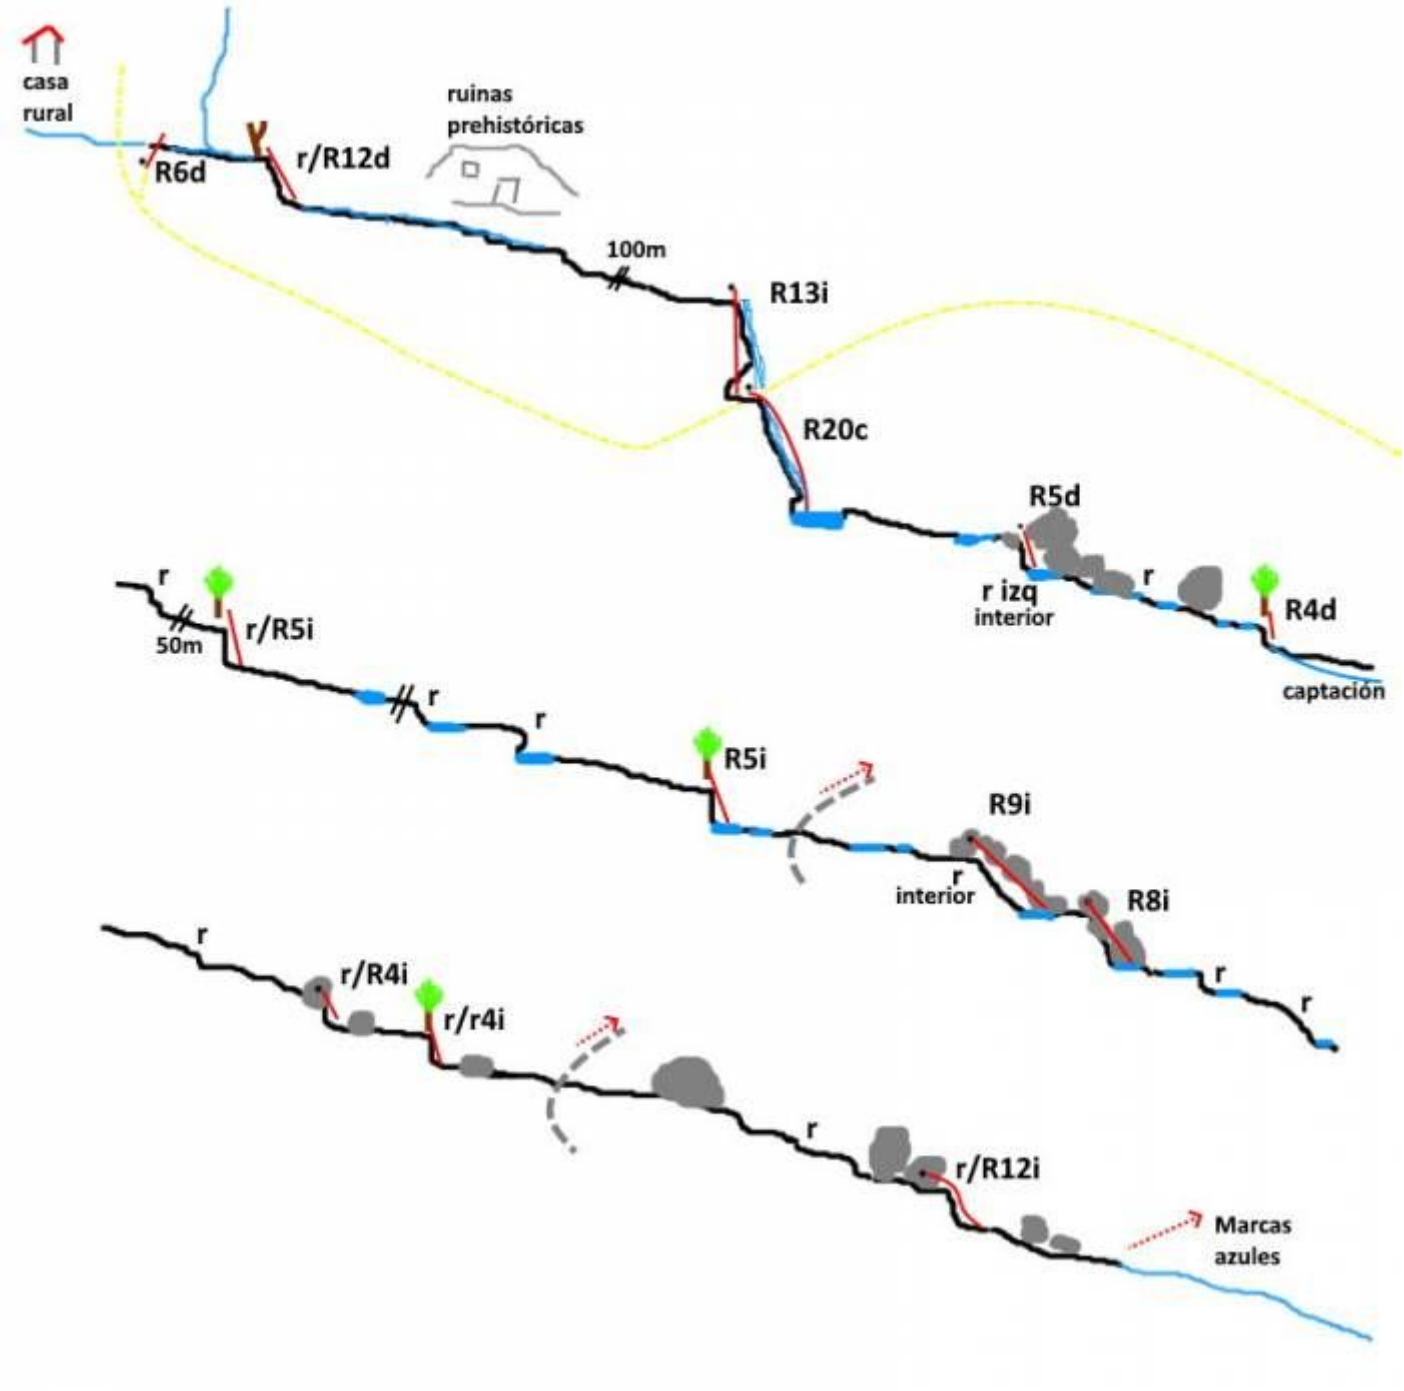

Tour: (machine translated)
The first rappel to access the river and another one a little further on that can be climbed from a dry tree. They leave us in an almost flat area of the river with some ruins before reaching the waterfall.
After the waterfall we will have small abseilings and destrepes to cross the rest of the descent. If we do not want to do the last part (only a 12m rappel) we can leave by the path that crosses the river.

Return: (machine translated)
By the blue markers to the access track
