Summary: (machine translated)
Interesting canyon (some people call it a collection canyon) if we take it after rains, with some water. It can be used for initiation to the rappel because they are simple, it usually always has a thread of water at the beginning (it can be avoided), that comes from the source of San Roque that is a little above.

Hydrology: (machine translated)
Not in the narrower areas, in the rest yes, to the right in the middle of the mountain.

Access: (machine translated)
On the CV428 towards Cortes de Pallás, once past El Oro, before pk 4, in a right curve we will see an esplanade on the left with a sign "Vertedero". We park

Approach: (machine translated)
We will leave from here by a track that heads east, turns north and after 100m turns east again to now go down to the stream bed.

Tour: (machine translated)
Quite boxed in and with beautiful formations. The rappels are easy except when there is water that can slip a little.

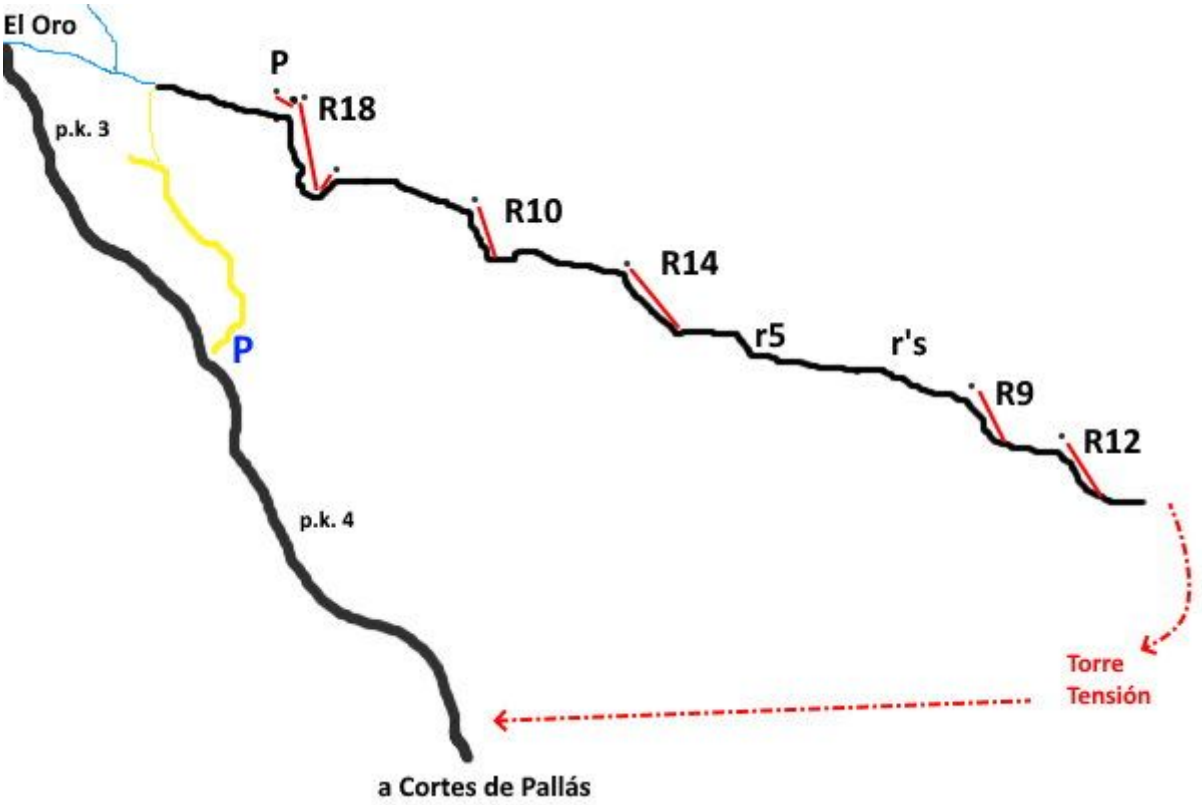

Return: (machine translated)
After the last rappel the ravine opens up a little and we have a gully on the right to go up in search of some milestones that will take us to the electric tower. There we have a track that takes us to the road. By the road we went up to the parking lot.it could continue until almost the reservoir of the naranjero, and then return by a track to the car (hour and fifteen minutes).but it has no interest, are only destrepes and areas full of vegetation and reeds.only if you really like the adventure.
